Compiled by Abbott Gleason

In compiling this bibliography of works on the Great Reforms published between 1953 and 1990, I have become aware of how difficult certain lines are to draw. Studies of the countryside, peasant disturbances, and radicalism all lie in terrain contiguous to that of the reform of institutions. The existence of the "revolutionary situation" concept, which linked institutional reform to these other subjects for many Soviet historians, makes the line even more difficult to draw. Nevertheless, the many Soviet and American works on Russian radicalism and on the peasantry have been omitted, unless they bear directly on the reforms themselves. In the same way, studies of social and economic change in rural Russia have been included only if they bear on the genesis or the concrete character of reform activities.

My thanks to Gareth Cook and the Center for Foreign Policy Development of Brown University for significant assistance on this project.
